AVALANCHE OF PANCAKES

"But I don't understand," said Prusakowski, the gritty gray smoke drifting up from his cigarette in a smooth, serpentine slither.

"Don't get what?" said Kendrick as he removed the thin glasses from his face. He brought the spectacles up to examine them in the sickly yellow light of the apartment's single swinging bulb. He lowered them to the hem of his stained dress shirt, heavy with the grime and sweat his three sleepless nights. He carefully rubbed the glasses with the hem of the shirt, and then examined them again.

Prusakowski opened his mouth to answer, but was interrupted by the sharp sorrowful crack of a .38 snub nose that filled the thick night air. The knob of the locked door fell to the scarred hardwood with a sweet, sultry swan song. The shadowed figure stepped into the doorway. His voice was like gravel. "I believe he was about to ask ... 'How cookie get on the Internet?'"
