AVALANCHE OF PANCAKES

The young man ducked under the frayed red strips of fabric that hung from the threshold and separated the backroom of the small, dank shop.

It took a moment for his eyes to adjust to the dim light supplied by the single sickly yellow bulb that hung in the middle of the room. He coughed as he waited for the owner of the store to follow him in. The air tasted of tobacco and stale sweat.

"Surely, my friend, one of my fine wares will be of interest to you. I handle only the finest quality stock," the shopowner said in a thick, rough voice.

The small man with the snake eyes raised his hand to motion to the shapes huddled against the wall of the room. Each was partially hidden by a thin threadbare blanket and settled on a small grimy pillow.

The young man cast a nervous gaze over the figures. He dare not let the snake-eye shopkeeper from seeing his inexperience. The young man pointed to one of the smaller shapes that tried to hide away in the corner. "I'll take that one."

"No," said the shopkeeper. "Not that one. It took great expense to find and take possession of this one, and the price is high."

But the young man would not be moved from his choice. He dug his hands into his pocket and pulled out a handful of sweaty, crumpled bills. "I'll pay extra. But I want that one."

Moments later, the young man stepped from the shop, lugging his precious new purchase in his arms. "Dude, Sam and Yusuf are going to love this," said Chris Cunningham excitedly as he pulled the blanket away from his newly bought hookah.
