AVALANCHE OF PANCAKES

"You don't need a reason to talk about tacos," said the bespeckled Deputy. Most of the congregation agreed, save for the tallest.

"I just don't understand why," he complained, his face a mask of irate confusion. The others rolled their eyes. A few went back to their busywork, while the remainder tried to explain the confusion.

"They're delicious, okay? Just don't question." The tallest nodded, but he was only beginning to understand. The others wondered why the concept was so foreign to him. Certain things they thought shouldn't have to be explained, especially tacos. With its seasoned meats, delicious cheese, crisp lettuce, fresh tomatoes and sour cream. Even bacon bits for some. There were few things more glorious and more worthy to be talked about.

A silence fell over the room as each one let the conversation stew in their minds. No visions of sugar plums here—only tasty Mexican goodness danced in their heads. Their mouths watering, they all mentally gave thanks for their salivary glands, for without them, they wouldn't be able to swallow the spicy treats that would later be indulged in. The silence was only broken when the tallest spoke once more.

"You never know, guys—the earth could be flat."
