A progressive beekeeping operation in Northern Alberta is looking for a student rep to market a high grade of clover honey at the University of Alberta. We have been producing and marketing honey for 30 years so can help you with information and marketing ideas that will earn you some money without taking up excessive amounts of your time that you need for studying. This clover honey is superior to any you will find on the grocery store shelves and is priced competitively. No investment is required but we do need an honest and friendly approach to marketing our product, which is 100% Canadian. Some pure beeswax products are also available if the successful applicant is interested. To enquire further or to set up an interview phone Bob Ballard at Ballard Honey Products or e-mail your contact information to ballarda@telusplanet.net

by Kati Kovacs

Well I hope everyone had a respectful yet restful Remembrance break. My time off was filled with flying discs, ruffled skirts, and hunky gay men. Woot!

Speaking of astronomy, take some time this Saturday night to glance up at the sky. You may very well see a meteor! Yes my friends, it's that time of year: the Leonid Meteor Shower is here!

The Leonid meteor shower is the result of the Earth passing through a stream of solid particles, meteoroids left behind by Comet Temple-Tuttle. As these particles hit the Earth's atmosphere, we see a streak of light: a meteor. If the meteors are large enough to survive the harrowing trip through the atmosphere and hit the Earth, they are called meteorites. I have several meteorites, do you? I didn't think so.

This year's Leonid shower will peak on the night of 17 November. You can expect to see about ten bright meteors per hour—possibly more if you're at a dark site outside of the city.

Also keep an eye out for Jupiter again this week. It'll be the super-bright object to the southwest one hour after sunset.

AstronoWatch is a weekly feature that covers the goings-on in the night skies, the galaxy, and sometimes even Kati's personal life.
