

astronowatch

by Kati Kovacs

"It's been a lo-ong road / getting from there to here" Sorry, I have the theme from Star Trek: Enterprise stuck in my head. It gets worse; it's the version from season three. Kill me now. As much as I try to love Enterprise, I just can't. Scott Bakula should've stopped at Quantum Leap.

Earth had another close call this past Tuesday. Newly discovered asteroid 2008 CT1 flew past our planet at a distance of only 116 000km! It was only schoolbus-sized though, so our civilization wasn't in horrible danger, just very mild danger.

If all goes well down at Cape Canaveral today, the space shuttle Atlantis will lift off at 12:45pm. The shuttle is delivering Europe's first permanent space laboratory to the International Space Station. If you would like to see the International Space Station, it'll be visible tonight for just under two minutes. Go outside and face west at 7:43pm. Make sure you have a very good view of the western horizon, as the station starts its pass very low. Hopefully, you will see a very bright object come into view and move to the south. The station's pass ends in the west-southwest, about 30 degrees higher than when it started!

PS: Star Trek: Voyager rules!

AstronoWatch is a weekly feature that covers the goings-on in the night skies, the galaxy, and sometimes even Kati's personal life.
